3. Threats to Validity. Although several strategies (including the use of random assignment) were used to control for threats to internal validity, some limitations remain. First, the study was correlational, and therefore cannot establish causality. Second, the study was limited to a sample of students from a single university, which may limit the generalizability of the findings. Third, the study did not control for potential confounding variables, such as socioeconomic status, which may influence both the independent and dependent variables. Finally, the study did not control for potential measurement error, which may have occurred due to the use of self-report measures.

These authors also demonstrated that the use of a single, non-validated questionnaire to assess the prevalence of depression in the community is likely to overestimate the prevalence of depression. This is because the questionnaire used in the study was not validated and therefore the results are likely to be biased. The authors also noted that the use of a single questionnaire to assess the prevalence of depression in the community is likely to overestimate the prevalence of depression because the questionnaire used in the study was not validated and therefore the results are likely to be biased.

14. On Average, Employees Receive 10 Although most employees have a great deal of autonomy, they are not given the opportunity to make decisions about their own work. The average number of decisions that employees are given to make is 10 per year. This is a significant finding, as it suggests that employees are not given the opportunity to make decisions about their own work, which is a key factor in job satisfaction and performance.

the 1990s, the number of people in the United States who are obese has increased by 50 percent. In the United Kingdom, the prevalence of obesity has increased by 100 percent in the last 20 years. For the first time, the study found that the risk of death from heart disease was significantly higher in people with a history of stroke than in those without. The researchers also found that the risk of death from heart disease was significantly higher in people with a history of stroke than in those without.
